'Locale II' Source Of Mental Illness?

As Beverly Orndorff pointed out in the May 14 Times-Dispatch, human life is tremendously affected by cycles and rhythms of both known and unknown origins. There are also radiations and vibrations, physical and non-physical, recognized and unknown, which have important effects. Psychologists and other students of human behavior would do well to be less dogmatic and more humble, admitting how incredibly complex and mysterious the nature and functioning of the "mind" really are, and how ignorant "science" really is in this area, in spite of the recently publicized discoveries about the physiochemical operations of the brain.

I have just begun reading a book, "Nutrition and Your Mind," which presents the thesis that much mental illness is due to nutritional deficiencies and chemical imbalances. But I have just finished reading one by Robert A. Monroe, a man able to leave his physical body almost at will and travel consciously in what he calls "Locale II," in which he makes a plausible case for ascribing some of the phenomena of some mental illness to perceptions emanating from this region.

There are truly more things in heaven and earth than the materialists are aware of, however valid some of their factual data may be.
